Law school is intense and competitive. The rigorous curriculum moves quickly, and you'll be expected to read at least 50-75 pages of dense case law every day in order to keep up. In class, professors employ the Socratic method, cold-calling on students and asking them to apply legal principles to hypothetical (and sometimes outlandish) sets of facts. Unlike most undergraduate classes, grades for law school classes are usually determined by a single exam taken at the end of the semester. Law school can be intimidating, but knowledge is power. Understanding the basics of the law school experience will set you up for success in your first year and beyond. The law school curriculum is administered over a period of 3 years. All law schools offer the same courses during the first year (called 1L). The 1L courses are: Civil Procedure. Civil Procedure is the study of complex rules that govern the mechanics of court proceedings. These rules often determine the who, when, where, and how of a lawsuit. Civil Procedure also dictates the rules preceding, during, and after a trial.Contracts. This two-semester-long course focuses on parties who enter into an agreement and what happens when a breach occurs. Criminal Law. This course covers criminal offenses, including what makes something a criminal offense and how crimes are punished. Property Law. In Property Law, you'll study the acquisition, possession, and disposition of property. Expect to study dense case law outlining the nuances of property ownership. Torts. Torts is the study of harmful acts that are punishable under civil law. You will learn about the repercussions of trespassing, false imprisonment, assault/battery, and more. Constitutional Law. In Constitutional Law, you will learn about the structure of the United States government and individual rights. Legal Research/Writing. This course teaches students the fundamentals of legal writing and how to write a legal memo. In the second and third years, students can choose classes based on their interests. Courses vary depending on the faculty of law, but the typical ones include 3. taxes, intellectual property, deeds, trial advocacy, 4. 5. and acquisitions. It's a good idea to take a variety of classes to decide which area of practice to follow 3 law school. If possible, try to sit on a course before applying to law school. This experience is useful because you can't learn how law school classes are held without having the pressure to perform. In law school, many of your reading tasks will come from case books. Cases compile judicial opinions, called "cases" related to a specific area of the law. You are expected to read cases and extrapolate broader concepts and legal principles based on how the case was decided. In the class, teachers will ask you not to take the principles that you have not extrapolated from the case and apply them to a different set of facts (called "de facto standards"). In every case, reading tasks don't say everything you don't need to know. It is hoped that you will not apply the skills of Christian thinking to everything that is not 4 to draw the correct conclusions. This step-by-step primer explains the process: during the first reading of the case, identify the facts, the parts of the case and what the plaintiff or the plaintiff is trying to accomplish; Don't worry about getting all the details. During the second reading, identify the procedural history 3 the case and take note of the relevant facts. During the third reading, improve the relevant facts, focus on judicial interpretation and think about how interpretation would change if another standard were indeed used. Read a case multiple times Default practice; With each reading, you will not be better prepared to answer questions in the classroom. Over time, practice will become second nature and you will identify the main information with more efficiency.
